WORKING PAPERS

The Unintended Consequence of Patient's Active Participation: A Theoretical and Experimental Study of Patient-Doctor Relationships (Job Market Paper)

Abstract: Empirical evidence shows that patients' noncompliance with doctors' recommendations is a prevalent issue in the patient-doctor relationship, yet the impact of such noncompliance on doctors' performance remains unclear. In this paper, I develop a model within the framework of client-expert interaction to address this question. The model predicts that clients choose not to comply with their experts' recommendations if they perceive the diagnosis to be imprecise. More importantly, the model predicts that this noncompliance will reduce experts' investment in improving diagnostic precision, particularly among experts who prioritize clients' well-being. A laboratory experiment validates the theoretical predictions and investigates the effectiveness of two interventions, namely communication and reputation, in improving clients' welfare. This study illustrates the complexity of the dynamics of patient-doctor interactions and highlights the unintended adverse consequence of patients' active participation in their own diagnosis on doctors' performance which further reduces patients' welfare. Furthermore, this study proposes potential interventions to improve patient-doctor relationships and promote patient welfare.
